Living Dockside and Furloughed

The Why's of a Solo Sailor

How do they do that? If you're out on a passage, I understand you are so busy trying to keep water on the outside of your boat you don't really miss another person onboard. When you spend a lot of time at the dock and you really want to go sail, you mentally go through the list of friends you can call and say, "Hey you want to go spend a day sailing?"

And when I say the day, I mean the WHOLE day. To get from the dock to the actual ocean it's 3 miles of meandering through the mangrove channels. By this time your guests are looking at you and I can pretty much read their minds, "does this fricking thing go any faster?" I look at their bored faces and say,

"Guys ,guys, sailing is not about the destination it's about the journey." Four more people just removed themselves from my sailing list, shit!

Getting She Breeze ready is pretty quick, well, relatively. Undo the shore power the shore water hose, then checking the systems onboard, the steering the marine instruments which includes the radio, the auto pilot, the depth finder. Let's not forget the anchoring system, make sure the windlass is functioning. By now it's noon!

And guess what? We've got to be back before low tide or I can't get back into my channel. Many a night I've spent out in the mooring field waiting for the morning tide so I can get back to the dock. Maybe I should have mentioned that to my guests, oops!
